How the Russia-Ukraine conflict could put a dent in the food industry >

The war between Russia and Ukraine has put the nickel market in flux. A lot of metal nickel comes from Russia, and nickel is an essential part of stainless steel ... which is an essential part of many tools of the food and restaurant industry. Imagine what most kitchen tools are made of, or what a brewery has to think about with its stainless steel kegs. Julia Coronado joins us to discuss the markets' inflationary environment. The SE...

Europe's leaders are discussing a ban on Russian oil, but how far can that go? >

In advance of President Biden's trip to Europe, foreign ministers are meeting today to begin discussion of something many would rather avoid – an embargo of Russian oil. It's a tricky proposition, as Europe is much more reliant on Russian oil than the United States. The BBC reports on a Boeing plane crash in China as well as the Russian stock exchange reopening. We look into how the removal of medical collection debt from...

Plane carrying 132 people crashes in China >

From the BBC World Service: The Boeing 737 was being flown by China Eastern, one of the biggest state-owned carriers and one of the largest airlines in Asia. The last large-scale fatal air crash in China was in 2010. Plus, Hong Kong will begin easing some of the world's tightest COVID-19 restrictions, including flight bans, starting next month. And, the U.K. is planning for a greener, more diverse energy mix by blending hydrogen...

The crypto rush hits Texas >

Lately, we've been exploring cryptocurrency mining, the energy-intensive — and potentially quite lucrative — computing process that produces currencies like bitcoin. Up until last summer, China led the world in crypto mining — thanks in part to its hydroelectric infrastructure. Then the Chinese government cracked down on crypto and many mining companies moved to wherever they could find cheap power, like Kazakhstan,...

One eye on the commodity markets, folks >

Today we'll preview a story we think we'll be talking about more soon, including on next week's evening broadcast at "Marketplace." There's been increasing tumult in multiple commodity markets since Russia's invasion of Ukraine. The markets for wheat, oil and various metals are being stretched to their limits as officials try to navigate both the war and prolonged supply chain issues. For Economics on Tap, our hosts discuss w...

On a two-hour call with Chinese President Xi Jinping today, President Joe Biden warned of consequences if China helps Russia avoid the effects of Western sanctions. Today, we'll look at how China could backfill the hollowed-out Russian economy. Plus: Government money for COVID boosters is running out, and a Texas town is going all in on crypto. We'll kick off the show with our panel of experts, breaking down the...
